trades were already in the hands of competent non-Jews when the mass immigration of the Jews began, and thev found it much more difficult to enter these branches than m Europe, where they participated from the beginning in the development of modern trade.